these songs in mp3 format, here are the list of files you can download.Q: How can I control Android application when data is not stored locally? I have an Android Application where I want to have inbuilt feature where users can download the songs of the Artists they are interested in. They can choose any artist from a list and the songs of the chosen artist will be downloaded on-thefly on the mobile device. Is there any way to achieve this with out keeping the data locally on the mobile device? I found that the external storage size on Android is very low, just 10 MB. The data must be downloaded locally by the application and must be on the phone. Is there any way to achieve this without writing the data locally? A: You can use a webservice to do this for you, I really suggest using the REST api from google here is the link and when the user picks the song to download, you send a http request to a webservice, the webservice returns a json response with the data, then you can store the data in a sqlite or something else file, or on the phone storage, here is some sample code for what you want using REST, and when its connected you can display a list of 0cc13bf012
