The year 1982 was the first year of the PC era, and it changed everything in software. In those days, most CAD was done on mainframe computers with a mainframe-based CAD program. Early CAD packages such as Vectron and NACO were purchased from the mainframe computers and ran on a graphics terminal in a room away from the mainframe room. Once the mainframe user was done, he or she had to come back to the mainframe room to make corrections. The last thing that a mainframe CAD operator wanted to do was go to another room to make corrections. Mainframe CAD was far from "the next generation of computer-aided design". In 1985, AutoCAD was released for the IBM PC, and soon it was the most used CAD program in the world. AutoCAD was a far better product than most other similar packages. Not only was it much easier to use than competing products, but it ran on most personal computers. The year 1985 was the first year of the Microsoft Windows era, and it quickly became the operating system for most computers. Within a year, most CAD software programs were also available for Windows computers. In 1985, Autodesk was bought by SRI, and AutoCAD was sold to
