The number of dwarf planets in the Solar system. adj. By extension, dwarf stars are stars that are smaller than normal stars (giant or main sequence). Dwarf stars, as standard stars, represent standards for measurability. To: fredph, From: TheLion, Date: Thu, 8 Sep 1997 02:31:27 +1000 (EST) Subject: dwarfs! Hi and ree, I have a few questions. I'm a member of a class of high school physics that does their experiments in groups. I have a question, if anyone feels like answering. The question is: "What is the unit for 'dwarfs', when talking about the size of planets? Are solar systems considered a pile of dwarfs, if the planets are much smaller than the sun? What is the right proper unit for the size (or volumes, possibly?) of solar systems, and giant planets, and dwarf stars? Dwarf stars are identified by astronomers based on their mass (a measure of their size), not by their orbital radii. If they are over 10 times the size of our sun, they are identified as a dwarf star. If they are only twice the size of our sun, they are not a dwarf star. "Earth-sized" planets do not count as planets. Mass is a convenient indicator, but it is actually a misnomer. A dwarf star, for example, has to have a dense surface, even though they are much smaller than the Sun. The Sun is a giant, just with a very low surface density. Dwarf stars can have a dense surface, but we would say that they are small because they are really small compared to the sun - not because they are small relative to other stars. Intersystem distances are a better indicator, but are harder to measure. Good question - thanks for asking. - Professor Umesh -- On Tue, 23 Jun 1997, Umesh Arasan wrote: There is no single unit for the sizes and scales of things. This is why astronomers struggle with the definition of an astrophysical object. I suggest that a typical unit is a "parsec".
