The average American, even if she hasn't visited a single zoo in her life, is familiar with the face of the elephant, thanks to the popular The Elephant Man movie and its subsequent three sequels. But is it a real elephant face? In the words of a certain Geico ad, maybe not! If you've ever been to the zoo (or even seen a zoo in the movies), you might have noticed that they've all been drawn pretty much the same. However, that's not what happened in reality, and it's about time that anyone but the Hollywood elite knows the true face of the elephant, as well as how that face has evolved over the years. Read on to learn all about these nine myths about the elephant. Do animals have a language? They certainly communicate, but it's different than what we humans do. Don't get us wrong — we do use an alphabet when we read, and it's not even a human alphabet, but we're not able to distinguish between all the different vowel sounds and consonant sounds we encounter in our daily life. That said, animals don't have our ability to understand sound, much less understand words, and it's really their way of communicating. Though it's not to the level that we understand it. Do all elephants look the same
