Subscribe Now Football (often shortened to "soccer" in North America) is a team sport that involves kicking a ball through a small goal at each end of a rectangular pitch. Each team consists of 11 players, with one player on the field at a time. Similar to basketball, there is a two-minute/regulation playing period, followed by a two-minute/added time/overtime period and then a three-minute/sudden death/golden goal/shootout period. The player with the most points at the end of regulation time wins. Unlike in American football, two or more players can score a goal, provided they are teammates on the same team. Goalkeepers can also score, but only if a teammate has touched the ball before he or she touches it. The FIFA series is the largest, most successful football video game franchise. The series is hugely popular in European and Asian markets, but relatively unknown in the United States and Canada. It is the most popular sports game franchise on mobile devices. The game is a critical and commercial success. FIFA is played by two major groups: hardcore and casual fans. While it has received a lukewarm reception from some groups, such as FIFA '12's critics, it has met with wide approval from the gaming press and its core audience. What makes it different than other football games? FIFA's approach to the sport is different from other football games. The game focuses on a player's individual skill instead of team tactics. FIFA also places an emphasis on tactics such as positioning, managing team chemistry and adapting to the way the pitch is laid out, while other sports games focus on individual skills like shooting, passing, and dribbling. Because FIFA revolves around the player, it must adapt to a changing field of play, unlike many other games, in which the field of play is largely static. Players are more finely tuned and the game has fewer clunky mechanics than other games. As a result of this approach, the game has the most varied collection of player ratings in any game. FIFA also contains the most realistic simulation of the game. The ball has a realistic, unpredictable animation of moving in the air, and the impact it has when it hits the ground makes contact sounds realistic, though it is not as well recorded and weighted as the American football game.
