What's new in Grave Prosperity - Part 1:

, in a series Human society has been riding a thin balance for thousands of years. Technology has given us the long-lasting arsenal of arms to fight off nature (insert any war cliché here), but in this age of the internet, we are also increasingly able to destroy nature itself as well. The onset of industrialization was a good thing - it brought forth a lot of wealth to different populations, especially in the industrialized countries. Although, there is a common critical consensus from different socioeconomic perspectives who argue these same populations for the most part won't be getting anything near their current incomes for a very long time. In other words, we are potentially doomed to poverty. What is abundantly clear to us, and quite a bit of other demographics too, is our extinction. Yet we seem to be content in our current state, with second to worst income inequality in the world, and low prospects for any improvement by decades. Part of the reason for this seems to be our anger of having low income - the part of the population who cannot afford what they want or what they think they need to keep their lifestyle and health comfortable. We cannot have it both ways. We can't be mad when we don't have the tools to live happy lives at high incomes, without subsequently destroying the planet as well. On top of that, lots of people that can afford these lifestyles and still don't have them, don't see it as fun to live at all - a quality that they want more of in their lives. Another common idea is that the current processes of global energy/resource extraction and sequestration are just reaching peak - there are a lot of easy pickings on the Earth, but they are rapidly disappearing due to environmental erosion and human population pressure. The way people think about this concept is that these are the easy gains from nature, and they are running out fast. Of course, you really have to stretch your imagination to believe humans are going to have the self-discipline to stop and turn back some of our own progress in extractive activity once we start to realize it is running out. We can't conveniently ignore that this is not just a prediction, but rather a rational explanation for a long list of economic related crises/depression since the advent of industrialization. Instead of traditional consumption based economic crises, we are facing the crises of a consumer economy that is heavily driven by negative value wealth creation, instead of growth in a positive value one. The great recession is
