Genetic polymorphisms and adverse events in the elderly. The recent advent of biotechnology has greatly enhanced our ability to search for and study genetic differences that occur between individuals. Here, Thomas D. Pierson describes the polymorphisms that are associated with the extent of cell-mediated immune function and their association with adverse events. He notes that many of the events noted by others may have a genetic basis and that it is likely that many more are genetically influenced. He explains why we are so perplexed when genetic differences are found and why it is likely that more than one gene is responsible for such differences. The implications of these findings on geriatric diseases and health promotion are discussed. My name is Jason McManus and I am from the Land of Lincoln, Illinois. While I am a musician first and a writer second, I am excited to make this site my home and a place for free-wheeling musings on music. I am especially interested in folks that make use of this site to "listen" and learn from music. Last week, my colleagues and I received the new Bournemouth University Media Arts Graduate research report, Memory of Memory. I was fortunate to be able to see the final copy and was immediately taken by it. The project concerns the archive collection held by the university's Department of Art & Design, which I will cover in my next post. For now, you can read the project report and my personal review of the materials we used in our "New Wave" research project. ...they made reference to history by asking questions such as: "Why can't I use my own memory?", and, "Who is there that has memory and why?" (p. 13). The postgraduate students have chosen to focus on two individuals whose lives have left an indelible mark on the medium of the recorded music industry, such as Pete Townshend and Brian Eno. The focus of their research is to consider how these individuals use memory in their work, and the ways in which their creations (i.e., Townshend and Eno) are characterized by what kind of memory they represent. The postgraduate students are interested in how the creative choices made by these individuals may have been informed or influenced by their "personal memories of their early
