importance in the field of data communications and processing. It is desirable that these lasers be monolithic in construction in order to reduce the number of components, simplify manufacture and reduce cost. Typically, the active elements are distributed in the monolithic laser structure, and have heat-dissipating fins. The fins are used to dissipate heat from the active region of the laser, and to allow the active region to be in direct contact with the external environment. Such monolithic lasers operate at relatively high temperatures, on the order of approximately 200 degrees Celsius. Because of the rather high temperature, the laser generally is considered a Type II laser, and is equipped with a temperature-sensitive control circuit to control the temperature. One problem associated with monolithic lasers is leakage current. Leakage current is often described as the current flow through a diode having reverse bias applied to the device, i.e. when no electric field is applied to the diode. Current leakage occurs because the depletion layer formed around the junction of the PN junction diode extends beyond the boundary of
