Application/Program used. 2 Compaq Presario A900 Sound Drivers For XP 1.1.Q: Merge content between two different SQL Server databases I have two different SQL Server databases, DB1 and DB2, and I need to combine them. In DB2, we have stored procedures that are used in DB1 to update values. I have tried to merge them as follows: merge into Database1.dbo.DB1 as Target using Database2.dbo.DB2 as Source on Target.Department = Source.Department when matched then update set Value=Source.Value There are a few problems with this. Some tables have constraints, and the only way that I know of to solve this is to delete the constraints. Others have columns that have the same name but are in different datatypes. The exceptions are references to other tables, which are often constrained. The type of constraint is always different (e.g. unique key, identity, check constraint, primary key) but the name stays the same, so this cannot be used to identify the duplicate records. The time of the merge has also been an issue, so I cannot use it. Can anyone please tell me if there is some other way of merging the databases? A: It is because the schema names are different, not because you use different databases. For correct merge, both databases must have matching schema names. If you use SQL Server Management Studio, go to SQL Server Object Explorer and right-click Databases, Tables, Views and Sequences to see their schema names. You can change the schema name of the older database for your applications to match the schema name of the newer database for your application to work. You can also rename the schema name of an existing database. Check out 1cdb36666d
