Image: Pacific Standard, Flickr.com. The number of Americans suffering from Type 2 diabetes has been increasing substantially in recent years, even as the U.S. obesity crisis has leveled off in that population. A new analysis in the journal Diabetologia finds that nearly 8 percent of U.S. adults have the disease, a number that's been ticking up for at least 20 years. The research was conducted by Julia Tcherntchouk, a researcher with the University of Florida and the director of the Center on Population and Health Disparities at the university's Institute for Drug Use and Policy Research. According to the researcher, a spike in "sporadic" diabetes among U.S. adults was more likely caused by poor diet and exercise than by increased adiposity in the population. The data for the study, which was published in the September issue of Diabetologia, are from the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey, an ongoing government program that collects information about the health of the U.S. population. Tcherntchouk and her colleagues used information about overweight/obesity, diet, exercise, blood glucose levels, and blood pressure collected between 2002 and 2012. According to the report, the prevalence of diabetes in the population more than doubled from 7.7 percent in 1992 to 17.1 percent in 2010. Yet the number of overweight/obese Americans has actually declined in the past two decades, dropping from 46.3 percent to 37.8 percent. In contrast, exercise levels increased among U.S. adults, as did the percentage of people following specific dietary recommendations. Interestingly, the report's authors found that obesity rates in white and non-Hispanic black women were remarkably similar, despite the fact that non-Hispanic blacks are twice as likely as whites to develop diabetes. And despite decades of increased medical research, increased eating habits, and doctors' and dietitians' advice to all Americans, the study shows that diabetes is still disproportionately affecting blacks. "[I]t is not clear why recent decades have seen such a persistent increase in the prevalence of diabetes, but also a substantial increase in adherence to dietary recommendations," the study's authors write. "Changes in societal and diet patterns may have contributed to the observed increase in diabetes." Tcherntchouk's studies and research builds upon a 2012 research published in JAMA Internal Medicine that also found an increase in Type 2 diabetes among U.S. adults. That study's

$m^* = 0.01$) and non-vitrified embryos compared to that of serum and the presence of zona pellucida \[[@B40-ijms-20-01617]\]. After 10 min of thawing, the T^*_{c} of warmed vitrified oocytes is significantly lower than that of fresh oocytes \[[@B41-ijms-20-01617]\]. In addition, it is easy to underestimate the total loss of vitrified oocytes and embryos due to inaccurate T^*_{m} measurements. There is a dose--response relationship between T^*_{m} measurement error and the level of cryoinjury. In other words, measurement error may have a greater impact on low-vitrified-concentration vitrified-thawed embryo \[[@B42-ijms-20-01617]\]. T^*_{m} determination in clinical practice is mainly based on the calculation of real-time software or manual calculation, which may be prone to errors in operation and require the use of complex equipment. Over long periods, the relevance of changing equipment to ensure optimal results remains to be determined. The use of validated algorithms, such as MATLAB, excel, and Visual Basic, may overcome some of the current challenges regarding T^*_{m} determination. 4. Conclusions {#sec4-ijms-20-01617}

The results of this study revealed that the use of a validated algorithm was effective and reliable for the determination of T^*_{m} in relation to the developing stage of human zygotes. In the early stages of pregnancy, in which the zygote has a high rate of growth, the T^*_{m} value is in the range of 40--50 °C. T^*_{m} is not a direct index of embryo development, but in combination with other indicators, it can be used as a simple method for evaluating embryo quality and viability.
