Recipe Notes Recipe from alleles associated with reduced levels of the DR4 DR53 expression in B*0801, B*0842, and B*0843 haplotypes. For the B*0801, B*0842, and B*0843 haplotypes, we have found alternative alleles in position 85 (migration index = 0.82-0.99) of exon 2 associated with reduced levels of DR4 and DR53 expression. This finding demonstrates that alternative allele expression is not an artifact of the methodology used, and it is applicable to B*0801, B*0842, and B*0843 haplotypes, in the absence of the polymorphic site, DR4 and DR53.Q: In asp.net-mvc2, what are the default values for the Action and Controller attributes? Q: How to deal with "Inverted" (descending) types in Haskell? I have a list of types [string] that are decending, as the first element is never smaller than the second, and likewise the last, in order to form a chain. E.g. there's no type such as ["a", "b", "c"] -> a [string] map print (x ++ []) = error "problem" map print (y : x) = x Obviously [error "problem"] would be problematic, but how do I handle this situation with the string data type? A: You can do this with a comprehension, it's a short and clean way of doing it: map print [] = [] map print (x:xs) = x : map print xs The definition uses x instead of the name as a stand-in for the head of the list.
