Also, the company is scrambling to figure out how much sensitive information it may have exposed. According to a report from the Wall Street Journal, the incident revolves around a piece of security equipment that automatically scans public Wi-Fi networks in order to find networks with unencrypted Wi-Fi signals. This data was stored by the equipment, which was then sent to a customer service representative who could apparently log in and view the collected data. A laptop that was used in the incident (pictured above) contained the details of users who had Wi-Fi connections turned on, as well as the websites they connected to. Another laptop contained all of the company's employees' login information, which was also found in an email. Image: Facebook Details of what appears to be a LinkedIn password was also sent in the email to the service representative. The password was found to be associated with an Apple iCloud account. According to a spokesperson for WatchGuard, this data was not encrypted and did not contain any other personally identifying information, such as address or credit card information. However, this data is still sensitive because it includes passwords that can be used to access private accounts. The company also attempted to contact the individual that made the mistake by sending him an email. However, he refused to give up the password. The spokesperson said that the company did not know who the affected employees were or which networks they connected to. So far, the company has not disclosed how many companies were affected by this incident, but it is sure to face a sizable amount of backlash. Furthermore, the individual that made the mistake has not been formally reprimanded or fired, despite failing to disclose the sensitive data. The company's spokesperson said that his immediate supervisor did not know about the incident until after it occurred and added that this incident is not being reviewed as a data breach. Since the investigation is still ongoing, it is too early to say whether or not the individual knew exactly what he was doing and the company may not have to deal with the fallout of this incident.Q: RewriteRule or other way of passing a
