Every consumer project should be highly curated, but it's an option that I use all the time. I'm glad to hear you use these tools. We've been using ChoreMonster a bit over the last 2 years for managing our kids' music and related toys. Their incentive-based program seems pretty powerful and may make it more difficult for them to damage or build up their CD/MP3 collection, but it doesn't seem to be an easy way to organize it either. I agree that the Internet has a lot of very good ideas for music-related stuff—one that's nearly impossible to implement here in the rural areas of southwest Florida. @Danny, haven't read through the first few pages yet, so pardon the late comment. However, having been a self-described consumer of much music (and not much else) for almost all of my life, I can tell you that your approach is entirely sound, even if the warnings about the amount of "stuff" an individual can accumulate from such a source are accurate. Nice article. Also, I got my main source of music from the "Free music" section of iTunes. It loads up randomly through the day but I only listen to one track at a time. There's no guarantee of quality, but it's all I have time to do. As a trained musician and music conservatoire graduate, what do you think are good alternatives to do one's own albums? Really, the only way to get a better sound is to use the audio equipment which can record professionally. However, as a hobbyist, I don't think this is a very good alternative. It still costs more than going to a proper recording studio (even though a lot of music studios have done away with analogue recording). The second alternative is to have an audio 6d1f23a050
