
Crazy. Parineeta. 2.5. To Catch a Thief. This Is 40.Yves here. This is another example of the fact that European inattention to security matters is making things much worse. The refugee crisis is far more manageable, and can be assuaged by a sensible combination of generous humanitarian support to refugees (which the EU has failed to provide to non-refugees who have crossed the border into Turkey from Syria) and going after the Jihadists with a vengeance. This piece is an example of why the Left in Europe thinks the the alternative is no Europe: "Can Europe handle its migrant crisis?" By Bridget Sweeney Viral image via Thys Ulens "Can Europe handle its migrant crisis?" was the headline question for the Günter Grass poster campaign that was launched in the European Parliament on Monday. The MEPs have mocked up their bodies as a kind of human Rorschach test, where certain colours and shapes reflect peoples' attitudes towards refugees, immigration and Islam. (Click on image for larger view.) The photos are being circulated online and have been picked up by other outlets, notably the European Mirror in Germany and the Huffington Post in Poland. There is a more sinister significance to them. Should this subversive idea - one of the people, not one of the institutions - succeed, it will send out a disturbing signal that we should no longer expect either democratic action or the common sense that our collective welfare outweighs our individual liberties. Germany, France and Denmark took in relatively large numbers of refugees in 2015, but the numbers returned home earlier than expected and the humanitarian crisis has not abated. The EU has provided some aid, but isn't meeting the needs of the 3.5 million refugees who have made the journey to Europe from Syria and other conflict zones. The poster campaign, spread by Twitter, Facebook and other social networks, aims to highlight the issue without resorting to hysterical, unadulterated responses. The formula of good and bad resonates with public sympathy, and is likely to draw attention. The headlines, though they were chosen to be provocative, are not far from reality. Germany, Austria, Sweden and the Netherlands have all requested additional aid, but the
