Conjugated linoleic acid inhibits bone resorption and up-regulates Runx2 gene expression in murine osteoblasts through activation of RXR-RAR-dependent pathways. Conjugated linoleic acid (CLA) is a dietary fat that has recently been shown to have anti-osteoporotic potential through several mechanisms in rodents. The objective of this study was to examine CLA's effect on osteoblast in vitro and further to clarify its mechanism of action in this cell line. In addition to up-regulating Runx2 gene expression, CLA treatment also increased Runx2 protein and ALP activity in osteoblasts. In this study, p-ERK1/2 protein level, which is a known protein downstream of Runx2, increased in a dose-dependent manner after CLA exposure. Blocking the ERK1/2 pathway decreased RUNX2 protein and ALP activity, and also increased RANKL expression and increased TRACP activity. The same phenomena were observed when CLA treatment was done in the presence of U0126, a specific inhibitor of MAP kinase. Interestingly, siRNA-mediated knockdown of the expression of RARalpha and RXRalpha, two nuclear receptor subtypes of RAR, inhibited the induction of RUNX2, ALP, and RANKL by CLA. These results indicate that RARalpha and RXRalpha are involved in the CLA-induced increase in RUNX2 protein expression, and that their activation by CLA leads to the functional differentiation of osteoblasts.
